

FDU

Personal. Global. Transformational.

ALUMNI PROFILES

In the early years graphics and animation shared the same lab in the Dreyfuss Building

In the early '90s, professor emeritus of art Marvin Goldstein initiated the adoption of the then burgeoning computer graphics technologies at the then Department of Visual and Performing Arts at Fairleigh Dickinson University, anticipating the wave of opportunities, challenges, and perhaps disruptions that would then transform the field of graphic design. What used to be a collective endeavor employing layout artists, typesetters, illustrators and photographers was now superseded by individuals adept at the new digital tools, funneling creative power in but only a pair of hands and futher democratizing the ability to amplify and spread visually curated messages. The widespread adoption of the WWW would soon extend this tsunami, forcing designers to not just attempt to master the vagaries of visual communication but also to delve underneath its hood of codes and markup languages, forcing many to tap into their left hemispheres. Meanwhile, illustrators have expanded their repertoire of tools, moving from the analog to digital and welcoming the ability to change directions on the fly, as their muse dictates. With the advent of smart phones, tablets and other devices, the way we create and consume visual information can only continue to expand.

In the following pages are the alumni who have majored in computer graphics/graphic design at FDU since the program's inception. Many have pursued their majors through their post-college careers while some have gone into fields related and a few into totally different ones. Regardless, their success is a testament to their grit and dedication and a hallmark of the University's aspirations to nurture well-rounded individuals, designers and artists.
